Men would bleed and take a chance of the world to gain possession of it. Were there a thief of sufficient daring and cupidity ready to give his life for it the stone would be worth the risk, but such an undertaking is so hopeless that the risk would never be taken.

It is the terrible beauty of the stone and the comfort it would buy, this small bit of yellow "glass," that makes men think.

A year ago a Kaffir in the Kimberley mines gave a yell of exultation. He drew the instant attention of the super-intendent, who looked in a dazed manner upon a dull-looking mass of yellow stone. He took it mechanically to the offices of the De Beers Company.

Wygant, a liveryman of Port Richmond, is in position to snap his fingers at the claimants of the pots of gold he found in the ruins of the old Hatfield home last Wednessed day. He is enapping his fingers now, as far as that is concerned, but the other claimants are heedless of the snaps. They have engaged lawyers to fight for the treasure and proclaim distinction to abate their eagerness in the quest.

The feeling of disgust that envelops these claimants—they being Charles Rosenfeld, a dry-goods merchant, of this city, and James Hatfield, the only living heir of Jacob Hatfield, who buried the gold—is too deep to be expressed in words. There is another extremely disgusted man in Richmond Borough, too. He answers to the name of J. W.
